Health dept. moots collaborative study with ICMR-NIE on brain infection cases

A.S. Javanth
KOZHIKODE

The Health department in Kerala is reportedly planning to have a collaborative study with the National Institute of Epidemiology (NIE), Chennai, which comes under the Indian Council of Medical Research (ICMR), to identify the risk factors responsible for the recent amoebic meningoencephalitis cases in the State.

Sources told The Hindu on Tuesday that it would be a case control study (an observational study meant to look at factors linked with diseases or outcomes).

Two groups would be identified: people with a specific health outcome or condition (cases) and those without the outcome (controls).

Reference cases

Here, those who had been infected after using a particular water source (ponds, wells, etc.) would be considered as “cases” and those who had not been infected after using the same water source would be considered as “control”.

Amoebic meningoencephalitis, a rare, but deadly brain infection, is caused by free-living amoebae found in waterbodies.

A research article detailing the epidemiological profile (patterns, statistical characteristics, and determinants of a health condition in a population along with the data on its prevalence, distribution, and risk factors) and natural history of all the reported cases of amoebic meningoencephalitis in Kerala in 2024 could be published thereafter.

The sources said that another proposal was to have a study in association with the Indian Institute of Science, Bengaluru, for the genomic sequencing of amoeba isolates collected from various water sources.

Collaborations would also be established with the Division of Medical Parasitology at the Post Graduate Institute of Medical Research, Chandigarh, and AVM Institute, Puducherry.

The abiotic factors (living components) and biotic factors (non-living components) influencing the growth of free-living amoeba, which is causing the infections, would be studied in collaboration with the State Pollution Control Board and the Department of Environmental Engineering, University of Kerala. Surveillance of surface waterbodies in affected areas along with a sanitation survey would have to be held to formulate an action plan for reducing pollution.
